History

Emily House was built for Emily Davies, the wife of a wealthy Washington, D.C., businessman. Davies was a prominent socialite and philanthropist, and she wanted a home that would reflect her status and wealth. She commissioned Amy Belding Brown to design the house, and Brown created a stunning masterpiece that is still admired today.

Architecture

Emily House is a three-story brick building with a slate roof. The house is asymmetrical in design, with a variety of gables, dormers, and bay windows. The front facade is dominated by a large porch with a round archway. The porch is supported by four columns, and it features a balustrade with intricate carvings.

The interior of Emily House is just as impressive as the exterior. The house features high ceilings, large windows, and a grand staircase. The rooms are decorated with elaborate moldings, carvings, and stained glass windows. The house also has a number of fireplaces, which were originally used to heat the house.

Significance

Emily House is a significant historic landmark for several reasons. First, it is one of the few remaining examples of Amy Belding Brown's work. Brown was a pioneering female architect who designed a number of notable buildings in Washington, D.C. Emily House is one of her most famous works, and it is considered to be one of the best examples of Victorian architecture in the city.

Second, Emily House is significant for its association with Emily Davies. Davies was a prominent socialite and philanthropist, and she played an important role in Washington, D.C., society. Emily House was her home for many years, and it is a testament to her wealth and influence.

Emily House Today

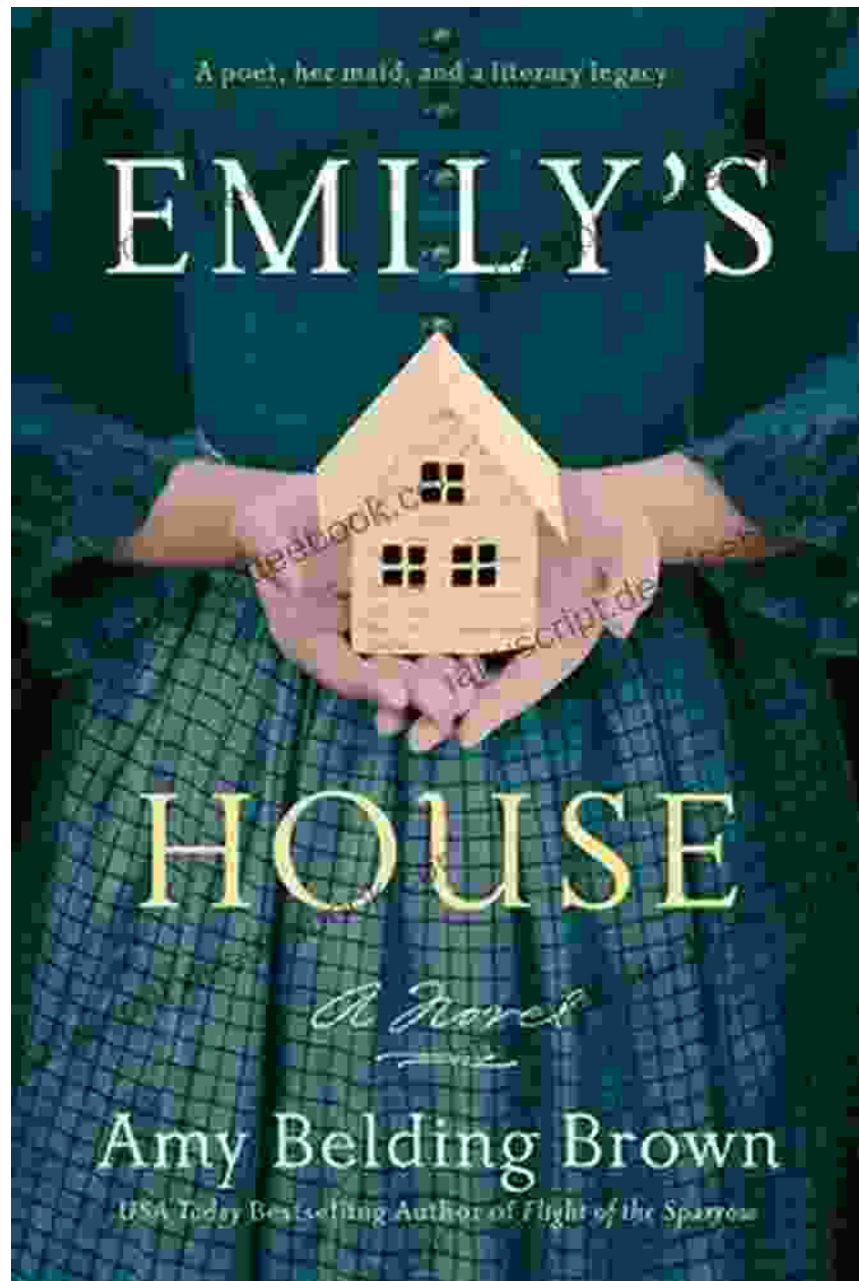

Emily House is now a private residence. The house is not open to the public, but it can be viewed from the street. Emily House is a beautiful and historic landmark that is an important part of Washington, D.C.'s architectural heritage.
