It was a call from the firehouse, reporting that a plane had hit the World Trade Center. Smith and his fellow firefighters rushed to the scene, arriving just minutes after the second plane had struck the South Tower.

The scene that greeted them was one of utter chaos and devastation. The Twin Towers were engulfed in flames, and people were jumping from the windows to escape the inferno.

Smith and his fellow firefighters immediately went to work, searching for survivors and fighting the flames. They worked tirelessly for hours, but it soon became clear that the situation was hopeless.

As the towers began to collapse, Smith and his fellow firefighters were forced to flee for their lives. They made it out of the danger zone just seconds before the buildings came crashing down.

In the aftermath of the attacks, Smith was haunted by what he had seen and experienced. He struggled with post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and other mental health issues.

But Smith also found a way to channel his pain into something positive. He became a tireless advocate for the victims of 9/11 and their families.

In 2002, Smith published a book about his experiences at Ground Zero, entitled "Report From Ground Zero." The book became a bestseller, and it helped to raise awareness of the physical and emotional toll that the attacks had taken on first responders.

Smith has also been a vocal critic of the Bush administration's response to the attacks. He has argued that the government failed to adequately protect the first responders who were sent to Ground Zero.

Smith's story is a powerful reminder of the horrors of 9/11 and the sacrifices that were made by first responders. It is a story that deserves to be told and retold, so that we never forget the lessons of that tragic day.
